Motor development. Motor development occurs in an orderly sequence as infants move from reflexive reactions (e.g., sucking and rooting) to more advanced motor functioning. This development proceeds in a cephalocaudal (from head-down) and proximodistal (from center-out) direction. For instance, babies first learn to hold their heads up, then sit ...

ability to control the body's movements including the movement of the eyes. Gross motor skills include the movement of large limbs or the whole body as in walking.

Perceptual Motor Skills | Play Encyclopedia

Perceptual learning is typically specific to the stimulus attributes used during training, including motion direction in a direction-discrimination task 33. This phenomenon helps to distinguish perceptual learning from cognitive or motor changes and has been used to argue that the underlying changes occur at early stages of sensory processing 2.
